

To whom it may concern,

As a consumer of network channels, I fail to understand the controversy over being 'allowed' to receive these channels. The FCC has recently denied us this right, so at this time, we cannot receive any network channels, as we live too far away (over 60 miles) from any local networks. How can this ruling be fair? Without any information from us, based just on our address, they have decided we don't qualify? Why are we being discriminated against? If we had more competition perhaps our local cable companies would provide better service and at more reasonable pricing! We should not be forced to go to our local cable company for network channels because someone from outside our area, who does not even experience these problems, looks at our address on a piece of paper and denies us without any type of representation!
